

Treasury Markets Room

Financial Analyst Opportunities

The Treasury Markets Room advises senior Departmental and White House officials on developments in global financial markets, prepares daily market briefings for Treasury staff, and provides guidance on market ramifications of policy initiatives. The goal is to ensure a deep, coordinated, and relevant understanding of market dynamics among senior policymakers and Treasury staff at large. The office analyzes global fixed income, foreign exchange, equity, and derivatives markets, as well as financial market infrastructure and the interrelations between policy and price action. Outputs include daily oral and written briefings for senior officials, in-depth market analysis memos, and synthesis of markets-related research. The Markets Room also acts as a primary conduit for Treasury's engagement with the financial sector.

In its daily activities, the Markets Room (i) analyzes price developments on a real-time basis using Bloomberg, Reuters, and other financial information resources, (ii) speaks to a wide range of financial market participants, (iii) tracks financial markets research and trends, (iv) performs quantitative markets analysis, and (v) interacts with various agencies and institutions, including regulators, international financial institutions and the Federal Reserve System. Markets Room analysts travel periodically to their various regions of coverage.

The Markets Room reports both to the Assistant Secretary for International Finance and to the Assistant Secretary for Financial Markets through their delegates in International Affairs and Domestic Finance. The Markets Room staff includes financial markets experts and economists with a range of backgrounds including foreign exchange, fixed income, equities, risk and supervision, and emerging markets.

The Markets Room has been featured in a range of financial media, including the Washington Post, the New York Times, and CNBC.
